

This is what media consolidation is bringing us to: monopolization and its resulting lack of competition encourages groups like Sinclair to stop serving the citizenry by providing them with the unbiased truth -- and to start looking for ways to make the public serve them, ie, propaganda, omission of articles out of corporate self-interest, etc.

This is the way to kill a democracy. Small, self-serving men may not mind sacrificing the ideals of the country which gave them the chance to prosper in the first place if that means ever more self-indulgence (their egos merely deny this, stroking themselves instead with the fallacy that they're "self-made"), but reality will eventually catch up to them.

Your job is to bring that reality to them now while still rectifiable through the execution of law, rather than later after the whole country's been put through hell. Please do it!
